could fund an hour of a Stroke Support Coordinator's time, ensuring stroke survivors are fully supported after a stroke and into their recovery.

£50

could help pay for research into new stroke treatments, as we did with thrombolysis - a clot-busting drug that returns the blood supply to the brain that has transformed the outcomes of stroke survivors who have received it.

£80

could pay for a stroke survivor to attend a six week computer course, a vital communication tool to aid recovery and beyond.

£199

could pay for one hour of Helpline activity, helping the families of stroke survivors support their loved ones after stroke.

£300

could allow a befriending volunteer to work with a stroke survivor for up to a year, perhaps accompanying them on a bus journey once a week until they feel confident enough to take the same journey on their own.

£525

could help pay for a block of communication support workshops, empowering stroke survivors to achieve the best possible level of communication, improving confidence and independence.
